About Workshop

Effective academic writing and efficient project management are essential skills in today's research-driven environment. Academic writing not only facilitates the dissemination of knowledge but also ensures clarity and coherence in presenting research findings. However, many scholars encounter challenges such as structuring arguments, maintaining consistency, and meeting publication standards.

Project management, on the other hand, is critical for the successful execution of research and academic initiatives. It involves planning, resource allocation, risk assessment, and monitoring to achieve objectives within specified timelines. Despite its importance, formal training in project management is often lacking in academic settings, leaving researchers unprepared to handle complex projects.

This two-day national workshop is designed to equip participants with the tools and techniques required for mastering these critical skills. It will include sessions on writing research papers, organizing literature reviews, and preparing impactful proposals, alongside modules on effective project planning, execution, and evaluation.
